When a Genesa® crystal is a timely addition to the garden and located in its correct spot, it strengthens and enhances the balance that is already there. When it is out of place and added at the wrong time, it can throw a garden environment off balance, resulting in chaos.

Pan on Creating a Garden Environment

It might simplify your understanding of the planning stage if you saw your garden as a fine, delicate, gourmet soup in which the eventual success of the soup depends on the lightest and most careful of touches. A pinch of salt would add to the perfection, but a pinch and a half would break the delicate balance the chef attempts to create and reduce his soup to an ordinary, perhaps even unpalatable experience.

When we work with you to consciously create a garden environment, we approach the task with the lightest of touches so as not to tilt the balance at any given moment. A specific crystal placed in one position may be the perfect pinch of salt, in another position it is the pinch and a half. This applies equally to everything placed into the garden, be it mineral, vegetable or animal.

I might also add that we do not view any particular season as an isolated moment in time. We have an overview of the garden and a sense of direction that can be translated into a span of many years. We see one season as a unit within itself, but we also see how that particular unit connects with the whole, plus what lies ahead in terms of its growth and development toward environmental balance. All of these issues are part and parcel of what we consider when called on by you to help you create the co-creative garden.

Each season is a step in the healing process of the garden and its overall environment. I urge you to bear with us as we move your garden through its healing processes. We understand the healing steps in which nature must travel. In the garden environment where you and nature join in partnership, we look to you to help us by implementing those steps. You will not experience much understanding or logic toward what we are suggesting you implement, for these moves will be beyond present human logic.* In time, as we grow together in our partnership experience, you will learn through observation, and a new logic and reason will enfold you. For now, I ask that you trust our input. And see the garden, in the individual season, as a delicate gourmet soup, but also as a progressing unit of energy moving through a long-range healing process. Both of these dynamics are fully present in the planning information we give you.

* This is important.

I've heard from co-creative gardeners who have followed some pretty bizarre instructions from nature for a couple of years. Although they had no idea what was going on while it was happening, it was clear, in hindsight, that nature was moving their garden through an intense healing process. The gardeners felt frustrated, slightly insane, even disappointed for doing what they were being told to do. In some cases they had little produce to show for their efforts during this period. But when they stuck it out, they ended up with a beautifully producing garden that truly felt balanced.

WHAT GOES WHERE

We recognize your right at any time to say "no" to any suggestion we give you. We fully recognize your position as intelligent souls of the universe with the unencumbered right to dictate the direction of your life and environment. We will accept your "no" without hesitation and will adjust our information to you accordingly. But I wish to point out two things to you.

One. Although we can accommodate an arbitrary change in the planning and progression of the garden, it may only serve to unnecessarily slow the healing process your garden must go through.

Two. We of nature are also intelligent life within the universe. For the sake of the evolutionary growth on the planet, we not only ask but demand that humans fully recognize our position.
