

The Importance of the Biological Electrical System in Repair, Balancing and Health

Perelandra Coning Session
by Machaelle Small Wright

The physical electrical grid is the most potent healing and repair mechanism in the body. It functions well in dramatic ways because it both rebalances and revitalizes the body on molecular levels (from which the rest of the physical elements and systems follow), and it is the operating bridge between the physical body and the human soul. It is the primary system for marrying the soul and body into one cohesive, functioning unit. When one balances and/or repairs the electrical system, one balances and repairs the body's ability to organically function and its ability to maintain the inflow and outflow dynamic between body and soul.

This bridging dynamic between body and soul is vital for the body's ability to function in health and balance because the soul defines and gives purpose to how the body is to be ordered and organized, and how it is to function and operate. There must be evolutionary intent for the body to achieve the appropriate order, organization and life vitality from nature. With a human, intent is solely supplied by the soul. A damaged or weakened electrical system hampers the communication between physical body and soul, and interferes with the infusion and integration of the soul's intent that is vital for the success of the physical repair and balancing process. The human body, because of its involution/evolution (i/e) properties, cannot repair and balance fully without the interplay between the soul's intent and the body's corresponding shift of order, organization and life vitality. Without the soul's input, there can be partial repair and balancing based on the natural, organic balance of any living organism, but the individual will not be satisfied with the level of repair and/or balance until the soul's input is included. This can only be done when the electrical system is fully functioning in its role as the marrying bridge between the body and soul.

What many don't understand is the importance of the input from the physical body to the soul. Although the soul provides the direction and purpose for the body's function and balance at any given moment, it does not provide this information in a vacuum. From the body, it receives input about the state and potential of the body as a living organism and its immediate environment in which it is to function. The soul takes into account all immediately relevant input.

The soul is intimately linked with the conscious life of the individual personality as it is unfolding. To not acknowledge this interplay between personality and soul is to say that one experience is lesser than the other—the personality experience is lesser than the soul's. One might ask, "Why go through the exercise of individual personality experience if it is not important, even vital to the soul?". The personality experience is not the bastard child of the soul. The soul's ability to express and demonstrate itself on all relevant form levels rests on what is learned and demonstrated with each personality experience. It is through the personality experience that the soul becomes functional in practical and physically complex ways.

The personality level includes its physical body plus all action and interaction in the surrounding environment that engage that body on all its levels. Consequently, the soul must receive clear and immediate input from the body, through the electrical system, for there to be quality input from the soul.

Although the body physically demonstrates an individual's i/e balance, the electrical system is the first and most powerful point within the human body where i/e balance is manifested. It is from this point that the state of one's repair, balance and health flows. It is no wonder that those who are working with the electrical system, consciously or unconsciously, in areas of human health, can achieve what look to be miracles. These achievements are not miracles, however. They are instances where the electrical system, in its relationship to soul and body, is both able and allowed to function as it was designed.

Translated 26 July 1993 by Machaelle Small Wright.

© 1993 Perelandra, Ltd. All rights reserved.